Contracts Forms and Risk Management

Use company forms to help consumers understand representation, agreements, responsibilities, deadlines, and risk. Clear explanations and accurate records help prevent misunderstandings. Knowing when to involve the broker or a qualified professional is part of using the forms well.

This guide supplements The Listing Process and The Buyer Process. Those guides follow the transaction journey; this guide focuses on the documents, common errors, file standards, and risk decisions along that journey. Work through it independently, then resolve unanswered procedural questions through company support.

How to use this guide

For each form, learn its purpose, the point when it is used, the explanation a consumer needs, and the mistakes to avoid. Practice with current company-approved forms in a notebook or authorized training environment. Complete the exercises and compare your responses with the suggested answers.

Form numbers identify documents named in the company manual. They do not replace the actual forms or the applicable company checklist. Requirements depend on the property, representation, and circumstances. Confirm current versions and procedures with the broker; seek appropriate legal or technical advice when a question exceeds your role.

The three questions to answer before using a form

What is its purpose? How will I explain it to the client? What common mistakes should I check? If you cannot answer these questions, ask the broker before proceeding on an assumption.

1 Explain forms and recognize your limits

A form records an explanation, instruction, authorization, or agreement that matters to the consumer. Your job is to help the person understand its purpose and practical implications, complete it accurately through approved procedures, and preserve the record. Reading every line aloud is not the same as explaining it.

Use a repeatable explanation process

- Identify the purpose: what question does this document answer, and why is it relevant now?
- Explain the important choices, responsibilities, dates, and practical consequences in plain language.
- Invite questions and ask the client to describe their understanding of the next step.
- Complete the approved document accurately, verify required execution, and preserve the explanation and resulting record.

For example: "This document explains how we will work together, which services are covered, and the responsibilities each of us has. Let's review the term, scope, compensation, and your questions before you decide." Match the explanation to the actual form rather than relying on a memorized general statement.

Stay within your professional role

The company expects you to understand forms, explain their purpose and completion, and discuss practical implications. Do not practice law, interpret legal rights, give legal opinions, draft custom legal provisions, or speculate about legal outcomes. Involve the broker and refer to legal counsel when appropriate.

The same boundary applies to technical matters. You are not acting as an engineer, inspector, contractor, accountant, or appraiser. Explain what information is needed and help the client reach a qualified professional rather than supplying an unsupported conclusion.

Reduce uncertainty through good habits

Use honest disclosure, clear expectations, timely communication, complete records, and early broker involvement. Areas needing particular attention include agency, condition, inspections, financing, informal promises, occupancy, possession, and closing funds. Avoid reassuring statements that conceal uncertainty.

Document what matters

Record meaningful instructions, disclosure discussions, negotiation decisions, agreed changes, and significant events. Upload supporting documents promptly. A note can preserve what was discussed; it does not replace an executed agreement or establish a legal result by itself.

Put it into practice

Choose a current approved form. Write its purpose in one sentence, prepare a short consumer explanation, and list three checks before completion. Identify one likely question you should refer to the broker or counsel.

Check your understanding

A client asks whether a clause guarantees recovery of their deposit. Should you answer from memory?

Suggested answer: No. Explain the relevant process within your role and refer the legal-rights or interpretation question to the broker or counsel. Do not guarantee an outcome.

2 Use agency notices and representation agreements

Agency documents explain representation, duties, services, and obligations. Discuss them early, invite questions, and document the conversation.

Real Estate Disclosure Notice 501

Purpose: Real Estate Disclosure Notice [501] explains representation options, agency duties, dual or designated concepts, and consumer rights. The company calls for discussion early, preferably at the initial consultation, before advice, negotiations, or significant services.

Explain it simply: "Before we move forward, let's review how representation works, who I represent, and your options." Discuss confidentiality, duties, and choices. Avoid jargon, delayed explanation, rushed signatures, and assumptions about understanding.

Unrepresented Persons Notice 502

Purpose: Unrepresented Persons Notice [502] clarifies that you do not represent the consumer and owe duties to another party. The company gives examples such as open houses, company-listing inquiries, and certain showing or other interactions. Ask the broker when applicability is unclear.

Explain: "I represent another party in this transaction. This notice explains that relationship and your ability to choose representation." Address the form's confidentiality limits and avoid advice or conduct that implies the consumer is your client. Preserve the discussion.

Exclusive Right To Represent Buyer 503

Purpose: Buyer Representation Agreement [503] formalizes the buyer's choice of company representation. The company places it generally before showing homes, preparing or negotiating offers, and providing substantial buyer services.

Review the representation period, geographic area, services, compensation, buyer cooperation and exclusivity, company duties, and other provisions in the actual agreement. Explain the services and obligations. The company states compensation is negotiable; explain company policies and services without implying a standard rate or guaranteed third-party payment.

Explain how you will work together, the services, and each party's responsibilities. Confirm understanding of compensation and scope; ask the broker about unclear terms.

Keep the documents distinct

A notice explains options; an agreement formalizes the relationship. They are not interchangeable. Follow company procedures for explanations, execution, copies, and RBO records.

Put it into practice

For forms 501, 502, and 503, identify the question answered, timing, and one common error. Explain the difference between a notice and an agreement.

Check your understanding

A visitor assumes you represent them because you answered property questions. What needs attention?

Suggested answer: Clarify whom you represent, explain the applicable notice and choices, avoid inconsistent advice, and document the discussion. Consult the broker if the situation is unclear.

3 Handle dual and designated agency consents

When a company may represent both sides, do not guess about representation or treat consent as routine paperwork. Involve the broker, explain the applicable structure and alternatives, protect confidential information, and complete required documentation at the correct point.

Dual Agency Consent 504

Purpose: Dual Agency Consent [504] addresses the brokerage's representation of buyer and seller in the same transaction and informed written consent. The company specifies consent before dual agency is created, not after negotiations have concluded.

Discuss the relationship, limitations, and alternatives before the parties decide. The company identifies limits involving exclusive advocacy, negotiating positions, favoring one client, and confidential information. Use the approved form and broker direction to explain the actual arrangement rather than promise unrestricted advocacy to each side.

You might say: "Our brokerage may be involved with both sides. Before proceeding, we need to discuss what that means, the limitations and alternatives, and your questions." Do not describe silence, familiarity with the company, or willingness to view a property as consent.

Dual Designated Agency Consent 505

Purpose: Dual Designated Agency Consent [505] addresses separate company agents representing the parties and protecting confidential information. The company describes separate representation within the company and notes broker approval may be required. Follow company policy and obtain direction about the structure and required consents.

Explain how representation, duties, confidentiality, and consumer rights operate under the actual arrangement. For example: "Different company agents would represent the parties separately. This document explains how the representation and information are handled." Do not imply that separate agents eliminate every conflict or disclosure requirement.

Check both timing and understanding

- Confirm the potential representation situation with the broker before proceeding on an assumption.
- Explain the applicable relationship, limits, alternatives, and information protections using approved documents.
- Give consumers time to ask questions and make the decision required by the process.
- Document explanations, questions, required consent, signatures, and dates, and preserve the records in RBO.

Protect confidentiality throughout

A consent does not authorize casual sharing of private motivations, finances, or negotiating positions. Raise confidentiality and conflict questions with the broker. If you cannot explain the limits clearly, resolve that uncertainty before advising the consumer to proceed.

Put it into practice

A buyer you represent wants a property listed by another company agent. Outline the questions for the broker, the explanation needed before consent, and the information you must protect. Do not decide the agency structure from the scenario alone.

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

Check your understanding

Can you collect consent after negotiating because the parties seem comfortable?

Suggested answer: No. The company places dual-agency consent before the relationship is created. Involve the broker promptly and follow the required explanation and documentation process.

4 Explain listing authority and seller disclosures

Listing forms document representation, marketing authority, disclosures, and expectations. Verify ownership and property information and use the company process to identify required documents.

Exclusive Right To Sell Listing Agreement 408

Listing Agreement [408] establishes the seller-company relationship and marketing authority. Before execution, discuss agency, disclosures, pricing, marketing, and questions. Verify owners and required signers, address and unit or parcel details, beginning and expiration dates, price, compensation, marketing, cooperation, seller obligations, and attachments.

Explain the marketing authority, services, term, compensation, and responsibilities. Avoid incorrect ownership, incomplete signatures, unclear terms, compensation assumptions, and missing attachments. Refer unusual ownership or terms to the broker.

Property Condition Report 403

Property Condition Report [403] records what the seller knows about structure, systems, utilities, water intrusion, environmental concerns, improvements, and defects. The company places completion typically during listing preparation before marketing. The seller supplies the answers; you explain the purpose and general instructions.

Do not supply answers, guess, influence responses, or minimize concerns. Encourage accuracy and seek direction on uncertainty. Disclosure does not certify a defect-free property.

Lead Paint Disclosure 405

Lead Paint Disclosure [405] addresses lead-related consumer information for applicable residential properties. The company identifies construction before 1978 as an important applicability question and describes known information, available reports, educational materials, and buyer rights. Use the current approved requirements and ask the broker about applicability or exceptions.

Avoid missing signatures, omitted materials, and assumptions that a home is exempt. Explain the form and the information being provided without making a technical claim that the property is safe or free of lead hazards.

Concrete Advisory 407

Concrete Advisory [407] raises awareness of potential concrete concerns, encourages investigation, and explains limitations. Use it when applicable under company policy. Explain that it supports informed investigation, not diagnosis. Avoid engineering or structural opinions, speculation, and downplaying concerns; recommend qualified professionals.

Put it into practice

Create a checklist for an older property covering ownership, terms, condition, lead applicability, and concrete concerns. Separate seller answers from broker and technical questions.

Check your understanding

The seller asks you to mark “no” because an old issue was probably repaired. What should you do?

Suggested answer: Do not guess or provide the seller’s answer. Explain the purpose, encourage accurate known information, and obtain appropriate direction about unresolved questions.

5 Address property items and marketing permissions

Small assumptions about an appliance, photograph, camera, or public showing can become significant disputes. Use the approved documents to make choices explicit before activity occurs. Check that later marketing and transaction records remain consistent with the seller's instructions.

Items Included and Excluded 409

Items Included & Excluded [409] clarifies what remains and what does not. Discuss it during listing preparation, particularly when appliances, fixtures, curtains, mirrors, television mounts, or outdoor equipment create questions. Avoid vague statements such as "everything stays."

Explain: "This document helps everyone identify exactly what is included or excluded." Use specific descriptions and address uncertainty in writing through the approved process. Do not assume a marketing description or informal comment replaces the later contract terms.

Photography Authorization 421

Photography Authorization [421] authorizes photography and may address video, tours, and marketing images. The company places it before photography and publication. Explain uses on the MLS, websites, portals, social media, and marketing materials according to the actual authorization.

Discuss privacy and expectations. Do not take photographs first and assume permission afterward. Resolve questions about scope or rights using the form and broker guidance rather than guaranteeing control over every downstream use.

Audio and Video Recording Disclosure 430

Audio & Video Recording Disclosure [430] addresses devices such as doorbell cameras, security systems, interior cameras, and audio recording. Use the applicable company process when devices may be present. Discuss privacy, seller responsibilities, and buyer expectations.

Do not assume devices or recording are obvious to visitors. Avoid legal opinions about recording rules; direct interpretation questions to the broker. Document the explanation and any unresolved issue before relying on an assumption.

Open House Notice 432

Open House Notice [432] explains public showings, exposure, buyer activity, and neighborhood visibility alongside privacy, security, and access risks. Discuss it before conducting the event. The company says open houses should be voluntary and based on an informed seller decision.

Explain: "This notice helps you decide whether an open house fits your situation." Record the decision and follow the company process for authorization, preparation, and access. A marketing benefit does not erase the need to discuss risk.

Put it into practice

The seller wants photographs but is uneasy about public access and recording devices. Prepare a conversation outline using forms 421, 430, and 432. Note the separate decision each form addresses and which question requires broker guidance.

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

Check your understanding

Does approval for photography automatically resolve the seller's decision about an open house?

Suggested answer: No. Image use and public access are different issues. Explain the applicable documents and obtain the decisions and documentation required for each.

6 Explain buyer contracts and contingencies

Buyer forms record representation, investigation choices, offer terms, deadlines, and obligations. Explain significant provisions before the buyer authorizes an offer. Use approved documents, identify unanswered questions, and keep legal or technical conclusions with appropriate professionals.

Buyer representation and Foundation Advisory 506

Review Buyer Representation Agreement [503] before the substantial services covered by company procedure, including showings and offer work. Explain scope, duration, compensation, and responsibilities as described earlier in this guide.

Foundation Advisory [506] raises awareness of foundation-related risks, investigation, and professional evaluation. Use it when the property or company policy calls for it; ask the broker if uncertain. Explain the purpose without diagnosing, minimizing, or speculating about a structural condition.

Purchase and Sale Agreement 507

Purchase & Sale Agreement [507] is the primary buyer-seller contract. Verify parties and ownership interests, address and applicable unit or legal-description details, price, credits, deposits, financing, contingencies, closing, occupancy, possession, and personal property. Check applicable riders and explain the whole proposal rather than only price.

Avoid incomplete information, incorrect deposit amounts, missing riders, missed dates, or unexplained contingencies. Refer questions about interpretation, legal rights, and unusual provisions to the broker or legal counsel. Do not promise deposit recovery or any specific legal outcome.

Mortgage contingency

The company describes the contingency as protection in certain financing circumstances, subject to requirements and dates. Explain application timing, commitment dates, borrower documentation, cooperation, and the risk of missed deadlines. Verify the actual financing terms and required documents rather than assuming one clause applies to every situation.

Monitor application status, lender communication, and milestones. Do not assume extensions, delay action on unclear dates, or guarantee mortgage approval. Escalate interpretation or rights questions promptly.

Inspection riders

Explain inspection rights, periods, deadlines, limitations, and possible responses before submission. Depending on the agreement, options may involve investigation, repair or credit requests, negotiation, or termination if permitted. Arrange timely professional evaluation rather than waiting until the period is nearly over.

Inspectors, engineers, and contractors address technical findings. You help the buyer understand process and transaction choices within your role. Do not interpret reports as a technical expert or classify a concern without appropriate support.

Put it into practice

Using a training offer, identify every deposit, financing, and inspection date, its supporting provision, the responsible person, and unresolved questions. Prepare a short explanation of how a contingency differs from a guarantee.

Check your understanding

Financing is delayed. Can you tell the buyer the contingency automatically extends?

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

Suggested answer: No. Check the agreement and obtain broker or legal direction on rights and extension requirements. Coordinate promptly with the lender and TC.

7 Document walkthroughs amendments and extensions

The file must reflect what the parties actually agreed, including changes made after execution. Keep proposed terms distinct from executed changes, and do not let an informal understanding become the only record of an important decision.

Pre Closing Walkthrough 533

Pre-Closing Walkthrough [533] supports a review shortly before closing of condition, agreed repairs, personal property, occupancy, and readiness concerns. Explain its purpose and limitations. It is not a new home inspection and does not replace specialist evaluation.

If an issue arises, document the observation, communication, and proposed response. Notify the appropriate participants and obtain broker direction when needed. Do not ignore concerns or wait until closing to mention them. A completed walkthrough alone does not establish that every legal or financial closing requirement is satisfied.

Amendments and extensions

Use approved amendments when the parties agree to change terms, such as inspection arrangements, price, credits, closing, deposits, or occupancy. Confirm the specific change, affected dates, required signatures, and execution details. Obtain direction for unclear language or custom terms rather than drafting legal provisions yourself.

Explain: “This amendment records the change the parties have agreed to make. Let’s check what changes and which dates or obligations are affected.” Review the completed version with the actual agreement and company process, and refer questions about legal effect to the broker or counsel.

Do not substitute reassurance for documentation

Avoid “we will work it out later” or “everyone understands.” Preserve relevant negotiations and instructions, but do not assume an email, text, or activity note by itself completes the required contract change. Check the applicable process and required execution.

Update the whole transaction

- Preserve the executed change and supporting correspondence in RBO promptly.
- Update applicable transaction details, dates, activities, and tasks through the company workflow.
- Notify TC about the change, affected milestones, and open items.
- Confirm the client understands the next step and raise unresolved issues with the broker.

TC supports document organization, date tracking, and coordination. You remain responsible for client explanation, negotiation, document accuracy, and timely communication. Do not assume uploading a document automatically updates every related record.

Put it into practice

A proposed closing extension is discussed by text while an appliance is missing at the walkthrough. Separate observations, proposed terms, client instructions, required documentation, broker questions, and TC updates. Identify what remains unresolved.

Check your understanding

Both agents say a new closing date is fine. Can you simply replace the date in the system?

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

Suggested answer: Do not treat an informal discussion as completed documentation. Follow the approved amendment process, verify the agreement and dates, then update records and notify TC.

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

8 Maintain the official transaction file

RBO holds the official company transaction record, compliance file, operational file, and history. Maintain a complete record that TC and the broker can use. Documents stored only in personal email, messages, computers, or cloud folders do not replace the official file.

Start promptly and confirm the buyer setup trigger

This manual places listing file creation generally at execution of the listing agreement. It places buyer file creation at representation or offer preparation, depending on company procedures. Confirm the broker-approved buyer setup point; do not wait until closing or leave important documents outside the company record.

The buyer setup language differs from the accepted-offer trigger in the CRM and buyer-process materials. Confirm the governing company procedure before using a single timing rule. Preserve required records promptly while resolving how the workflow applies.

Include the applicable records

Use the company checklist for agency notices and consents; listing agreement and disclosures; property and marketing authorizations; purchase agreement and riders; amendments and extensions; inspection, financing, appraisal, and closing information; significant correspondence; and commission requests. Not every form applies to every transaction.

Check and upload promptly

Verify pages, legibility, names, property details, signatures, initials, dates, attachments, and consistency. Use clear names such as “123 Main Street - Inspection Amendment” rather than “scan003” or “finalfinalnew.” Follow company procedures for versions and retention; do not delete or replace records merely to conceal an error.

Preserve the timeline

Record pricing and disclosure discussions, material instructions, negotiation decisions, milestones, complaints, and escalations. Preserve significant emails, texts, attorney correspondence, lender updates, and amendment discussions. Ask whether the communication would matter if a later question arose, and retain it through the company process.

Correct deficiencies and verify financial requests

Review TC deficiency notices promptly, correct missing documents, signatures, dates, or inconsistent information, and communicate the correction. Verify commission requests against price, commission, referral fees, company fees, and supporting documents rather than assuming an earlier entry was correct.

Follow company retention procedures and the applicable requirements identified by the company. The company gives no fixed retention period to reproduce here. Do not destroy documents or maintain separate unofficial records. Ask the broker about access, correction, or retention questions.

Put it into practice

Audit an authorized training file. Identify a missing item, unclear filename, unsupported date, important communication to preserve, and financial entry to verify. Assign each correction a next action and responsible person.

Check your understanding

Can TC review substitute for your own accuracy check?

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

Suggested answer: No. TC provides support and identifies deficiencies. You remain responsible for reviewing contents, verifying execution and dates, and correcting issues promptly.

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

9 Protect information and manage risk

Risk management includes how you communicate, handle private information, set expectations, and respond when something seems unusual. Use the company's verification and escalation procedures instead of making assurances that exceed what you know.

Apply the company guidance on wire fraud

The company warns that fraudsters may impersonate attorneys, lenders, brokers, or other participants and send false or changed wiring instructions. Remind clients never to rely solely on email. Direct verification with the appropriate trusted professional using known telephone numbers is central to the company guidance.

Do not send unverified instructions, guess at procedures, or assure a client that an email is legitimate. If anything seems unusual, stop and verify with the appropriate professional and involve the broker. Do not treat a forwarded message or familiar name as proof of authenticity.

Protect confidential information

Clients may share finances, family circumstances, medical or employment concerns, goals, and negotiation strategy. Do not share private information casually, discuss it publicly, disclose it without authorization, or post it online. Ask the broker about confidentiality conflicts or disclosure duties rather than resolving them by guesswork.

Keep informal communication professional

Assume an important text, email, or social media message could later be reviewed by the broker or other appropriate reviewer. Avoid insults, sarcasm, emotional reactions, blame, and disparaging comments about consumers or cooperating agents. Preserve material communications in the company record.

Use objective and ethical practices

The company expects honesty, clear communication, material disclosure, respectful treatment, avoidance of conflicts, and consumer protection. Follow federal and Connecticut fair housing requirements and company policy. Avoid steering, discriminatory advertising or language, selective showings, and protected-class preferences. Discuss properties and objective information.

Replace guarantees with accurate expectations

Discuss pricing, market conditions, timing, inspections, financing, closing, risks, and limits. Instead of "that cannot happen," identify what is known, possible outcomes, and the next action. Refer legal, tax, engineering, inspection, appraisal, or contractor conclusions to qualified professionals.

Put it into practice

Rewrite these messages professionally: "The email looks fine, go ahead and wire"; "That crack is nothing"; and "Don't worry, your deposit is guaranteed." For each, state the uncertainty and appropriate verification or referral.

Check your understanding

Does the client's willingness to share a personal story with you authorize an online post?

Suggested answer: No. Protect confidential information and follow authorization and company procedures. Raise uncertainty with the broker before sharing.

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

10 Respond to complaints and escalate concerns

A complaint, unclear form, conflict, or unusual transaction calls for calm attention and timely broker involvement. Do not wait until you have solved everything before alerting the person responsible for oversight and risk management.

Listen and document

Let the consumer explain the concern. Record the issue, circumstances, dates, participants, relevant documents, communications, and any time-sensitive next step. Distinguish what is alleged from what you have verified. Avoid arguing, assigning blame, becoming defensive, or promising a result.

A useful response is: "I understand this needs attention. I will document what you have raised and bring it to the broker promptly so we can determine the appropriate next steps." Be accurate about what you will do and follow through.

Know when to contact the broker

The company calls for prompt broker notice about legal concerns, ethics questions, unclear forms, unusual transactions, consumer complaints, significant disputes, litigation threats, dual-agency questions, or uncertainty. Ask early when a question affects advice, required documents, deadlines, or consumer understanding.

Handle claims and attorney contact as directed

The manual states that the company maintains Errors & Omissions, or E&O, insurance. Do not assume that insurance establishes coverage for a particular event or replaces good practice. If a claim is threatened, litigation is mentioned, an attorney contacts you, or a complaint appears serious, immediately notify the broker.

The company instructs agents not to admit liability, negotiate independently, promise payment, or alter documents in these circumstances. Preserve the records and follow broker direction. Do not attempt to settle the issue privately or change the file to make the history appear different.

Give the broker a useful escalation

- Identify the transaction or consumer and describe the concern factually.
- State what is confirmed, what remains uncertain, and the immediate timing.
- Provide the relevant documents and communication history through approved channels.
- Explain what you have already said or done and what decision or direction you need.

Keep team responsibilities clear

You retain client communication, negotiation, advice within your role, and document accuracy. TC supports file organization, deadlines, compliance administration, and closing coordination. The broker handles oversight, policy, risk, and escalations. Keep TC informed about coordination needs without treating TC as legal counsel or a claims decision-maker.

Put it into practice

A consumer says an undisclosed defect caused a loss and an attorney will call. Prepare a factual broker escalation outline and list the records to preserve. Identify actions the company says you must not take independently.

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

Check your understanding

Should you promise reimbursement to calm a serious complaint before contacting the broker?

Suggested answer: No. Document the concern and notify the broker immediately as required. Do not promise payment, negotiate independently, admit liability, or alter records.

Copyright © 2026 List n Show IP LLC

Your forms readiness plan

Use this practice sequence with current approved forms, company procedures, and broker support. It is a learning plan, not permission to postpone a live disclosure, document, or deadline obligation.

Step 1 Learn the purpose and timing

Review forms 501, 502, 503, 504, and 505. Write the representation question each answers, when the discussion occurs, and what requires broker involvement. Practice distinguishing disclosure, agreement, and consent.

Ready when: you can explain whom you represent and why each document applies without assuming understanding or consent.

Step 2 Practice the seller documents

Review forms 408, 403, 405, 407, 409, 421, 430, and 432. Identify parties and signers, disclosure responsibilities, condition questions, included items, authorizations, and privacy issues. Practice the explanations without completing the seller's condition answers or supplying technical opinions.

Ready when: you can identify the purpose, timing, common errors, and broker or specialist questions for each form.

Step 3 Review the buyer contract package

Review forms 503, 506, 507, and 533, together with approved financing and inspection provisions and amendments. Locate amounts, dates, required attachments, execution requirements, and options needing legal or technical interpretation.

Ready when: you can explain practical steps and responsibilities while referring legal rights and technical conclusions appropriately.

Step 4 Audit the record and confirm procedures

Use an authorized training file to check completeness, execution, consistency, filenames, timeline, correspondence, commission information, and open deficiencies. Confirm buyer file creation timing with the broker because the supplied manuals describe different setup points.

Ready when: the official file tells a coherent history and open items have responsible people and next actions.

Step 5 Practice a risk response

Work through an unusual wire request, a privacy question, an unclear contract term, and a serious complaint. Draft factual communications and escalation outlines. Identify what you must verify, preserve, and avoid doing independently.

Ready when: you can respond calmly, protect information, involve the appropriate professional promptly, and document what happened.

Keep learning from real questions

Maintain a short list of unresolved form and workflow questions. Resolve them through the broker or appropriate specialist before relying on an assumption. Revisit the actual form whenever its version, property context, or representation situation changes.

Readiness scenarios

1. An owner wants you to fill in unknown condition answers.
Explain the form and encourage accurate seller-provided information. Do not guess, supply answers, or minimize concerns.

2. A proposed extension appears only in text messages.
Preserve the messages, confirm the approved agreement process, verify required execution, and update the file and TC when the change is documented.

3. A consumer complains and mentions a lawyer.
Document and preserve the facts and immediately notify the broker. Do not independently negotiate, promise payment, admit liability, or alter documents.

4. A client forwards changed wiring instructions.
Do not assure authenticity or pass along unverified directions. Stop and verify with the appropriate trusted professional using known contact information, and involve the broker.
